TMD Made Easy

What causes people to grind their teeth? Stress, correct? Recent studies have suggested that the airway may be the cause of bruxism in some. TMD conditions can be induced by bruxism. As more studies continue to be undertaken, we are starting to see that these issues may all be connected. Dr. Kuehne will cover the basics of the anatomy associated with the TM joint, the most commonly seen TMJ issues and how to properly diagnose/treat those issues, and how obstructive sleep apnea is related to TMD.

Learning Objectives:

- Basic anatomy of the jaw
- The difference between the most common TMD symptoms seen in dental practice
- Connection to bruxism and sleep apnea
- Case presentations

Sleep Medicine for the General Dentist

General dentists are in the unique position of seeing their patients every six months on average. It should be every dentist’s responsibility to screen and, when appropriate, treat their patient base for the serious medical condition known as obstructive sleep apnea. Dr. Kuehne will lead a discussion to include the basics of upper airway anatomy, an overview of the importance of treating obstructive sleep apnea, screening and diagnosing, examination, appliance selection, side effects of oral appliances, and practical pearls of treating obstructive sleep apnea.

Learning Objectives:

- Basic anatomy of the airway
- How to interpret a polysomnogram
- Oral appliance therapy and Titration of the oral appliance
- Managing side effects of oral appliance therapy
- Pearls from my practice (growing your sleep practice & guidelines for billing)
